Enhance your website accessibility day by day.

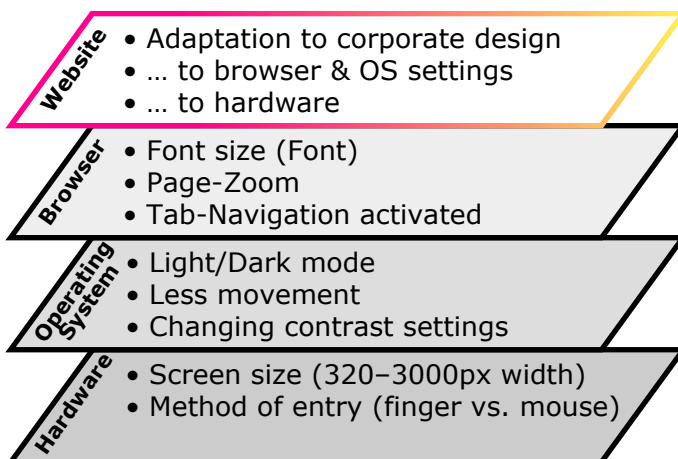

Only 4% of all disabilities are present from birth. The remaining 96% are acquired in the course of life. Some through accidents, others simply through normal aging processes.

We age not only individually, but also as a society. And what is often forgotten: as users of digital products.

HTML and CSS offer many possibilities to structure content semantically and to adapt it to different conditions, thus making it accessible for as many people as possible:

Browsers tolerate many errors. But at the same time they create errors themselves. That's why tools were developed to simplify web development. In the process, accessibility often fell by the wayside. Compatibility with devices and browsers counted more than adaptations for the people using them.

Often "only" clean HTML and clever CSS code is needed to significantly improve the result.

The program Barrier-fastening wants to remove the hurdles for web developers and build ramps to improve the code:

Each day, participating teams or frontend developers are given the task of checking one line of code from the HTML head, body or CSS instructions and improving it if necessary.

Barrier-fastening does not guarantee all-embracing accessibility.

This must be continued in the editorial area.

However, barrier-fastening is the beginning that must be made, because without the basics all other measures remain ineffective.

Websites of public bodies must already be implemented barrier-free.

From 28th of June 2025, the European Accessibility Act applies: companies from sales of more than € 2 million per year or 10 employees obliged to accessibility. (This is not legal advice)

Make your stakeholders, product owners and developers aware of digital inclusion now!
